

Liberty Without Tyranny

In order to ensure the protection of all individual liberties, as well as the proper and smooth functioning of the state government itself, Natural Law calls for the absolute minimal amount of intrusive government necessary to ensure that the citizens are secure, prosperous and free. Perfect government ensures the people's welfare without hampering the people's innate right to freedom. When government oversteps its bounds and begins to intrude upon the rights of the people, that government has then become a tyranny, and no longer legitimately reflects the will of the people. Such tyrannical regimes have as their only true purpose their own eventual replacement with a Natural Law form of government: a government of the people.
